[r16].patch-icu.rar The world got a bunch of new earworms the other day, thanks to a Siri-like voice feature on the new Macbook Pro. Apple's new voice feature synthesizes voices by taking natural audio, analyzing words, and sounding like a robot. It's really a neat new feature that inspires new types of music. The most recent, welcome use of synthesized speech came in the form of an audiobook called "The Storyteller's Diary," an Amazon Kindle exclusive read by Jay Leno. The audiobook has 2 hours of Leno reading out of a 1000-page book of essays by Charles Dickens. The Kindle version of the book had been put up for sale, and Amazon didn't expect much interest. But a few days later, when it actually goes on sale, it gets a huge amount of press coverage. "The Storyteller's Diary" was written by Chris Anderson, who has been working on an audiobook for decades. It's published by Audible, and Anderson has been working on the project for more than five years. He's been a big influence on music for a long time. In the past few years, Anderson has launched a new book imprint called TarcherPerigee that focuses on audiobooks. It's run like an academic press, and the imprint is run by a bunch of media industry experts. Anderson says, "I wanted to create something that was akin to producing a print book, that had this same sense of pace." The imprint focuses on publishing books "that have an impact." "In a few weeks we have to publish a book by Salman Rushdie, but we've also published one that outlines how to make your living as an independent author." And just like a hardcover book, the imprint only publishes audiobooks. There are some differences between Audible and the new audiobook imprint. First off, Audible has a much bigger catalog, f30f4ceada
