Current editors Brad de Long, Douglas Kysar, and Bill Dodson will be joined by Michèle Pere, who has published widely in the areas of biodiversity policy and ecosystem services in "Ecological Economics," and Philip Marvel, who has written extensively in the area of management of fisheries. By combining the work of the various editors in collaboration, the journal will seek to provide the broadest and most detailed coverage of this fast-growing field. Of equal importance, the new team of editors will provide a focal point for collaboration between economists and biologists, including molecular ecologists, evolutionary biologists, biometeorologists, system ecologists, and others in the diverse biological sciences. As a result, we expect to build stronger bridges between the biological sciences and economics and contribute to a better understanding of evolution and economics that brings to bear a wide range of new perspectives. This issue focuses on animal personality, which is a subject that I am most interested in. I suppose I work on personality a bit because its obvious importance as a central concept of the ecological and evolutionarily context, but the real reason I worked on it is the "interest" I had in it. To help convince others that you should read this issue's lead article, I'm going to highlight a few quote/facts/statistics that should stick out in any mind that isn't already convinced that the topic is intriguing. Still to come – the first piece in this issue in which I show that what an animal knows about its environment predicts its individual behaviour. That is a very interesting and important paper. It's about the ambient hum of a rock in a valley and how songbirds – wintering in that valley – can tell whether it's a good or bad place to make a nest, and work out whether it's worth the risk of singing while they're on their way there. So it's not about understanding

Its morphology was investigated by means of non-linear electrophoresis in both the native (polyacrylamide gels) and denatured (acrylamide-agarose gels) forms. It was shown that the peptide forms aggregates when diluted in buffer. The intensity of the beta-staining was maximum at 1% and reached 3-4% on 35 cm gels. The lower limit of the detection, as indicated by the detectable amount of fibrillar material, was estimated to be 0.5 microgram/ml. The L-form of the peptide gave a much stronger staining than the D-form with a detection limit of 0.5 microgram/ml. This method was then used to follow the kinetics of A peptide aggregation. These experiments proved that the rate of A peptide aggregation was similar to the amyloid A-protein.Pleasure Fries! Tuesday, October 29, 2009 This is what I had in my fridge when 1cdb36666d
