What's new in Doughlings: Invasion:

3' by Theodor Adorno Doughlings is a four-season, frame-by-frame animation series based on the life of Gregor Mendel, the German physicist, monk and the founder of Genetics. "Parts of Gregor's life we reconstruct," the show's in-house producer tells us. "Parts we put together based on art-history references, psychology findings, and translations of his writings." Some episodes follow Mendel in his scientific research, others follow Mendel in his religious life, and still others take a broader look at the historical context of the science he was engaged in. More than just a faithful interpretation of Mendel's life, Doughlings is the result of a long and intricate process, both artistic and scientific. "First, a common perception of genetic knowledge was established, by which I can roughly compare it with comparable parts of Gregor's life," the in-house producer, who we'll call Nolde, tells us. "To do so, I chose the period immediately before Mendel's discovery, focusing on the epistemology and psychology of that time and reconstructing what was imagined to be their result." The show's characters are all clearly drawn and coloured in — something the producers call naturalistic, and not photorealistic. "This means that the colours in the animations are much more lively than in a professional cartoon," they explain. "Leaves have more shade than the green cartoon leaves, the sun is more sunspot than in a normal cartoon, and especially flowers are more vivid than in a cartoon." "What you can see in Doughlings is a synthesis of the psychology of those days with the art of artistic information and communication," Nolde says. "Many references in the background and in the costumes of Mendel's followers match early styles, which are in the collection of the Saxon State Library. We searched for stuff that would be technically appropriate for the time." Not all things are correct in the show, but obviously other artists and scientists than Mendel were very well aware of his findings. For example, in Austria, a professor of biology named Anton von Leewenhoff wrote a book about breeding strawberries in which he also mentioned Mendel's findings about the incompatibility of certain sets of characteristics. Doughlings is not supposed to be faithful to the moments of Mendel's life. Instead, it is a sincere and reverent impression of the time. "While we take care of the details, knowing
