Pb droplets were deposited on SiO₂-coated Mica using the drop-on-a-stick technique and observed by contact-mode atomic force microscopy (AFM). Three different AFM modes were used to quantify the influence of the oscillating probe on the measured contact force. An estimation of the contact radius was obtained by monitoring the contact force during a constant contact time. The results showed a reproducible contact radius, allowing an estimation of the contact angle of Pb droplets. The contact force increased with decreasing contact area, suggesting that the contact area was in equilibrium with a larger adhesive force than the contact radius. The contact force is directly related to the effective adhesion of the tip to the sample. An estimation of the adhesion energy was obtained by measuring the contact force at different contact times. The results revealed that the adhesion energy was stable within the first 600 seconds and then decreased slowly. The energy of adhesion was estimated to be approximately 7.6 +/- 1.1 x 10⁻¹⁹ J/atom. e79caf774b
