What's so special about Ginger? Ginger is one of those delicious spices that make any traditional dish better, it's a versatile spice that can be added to many different dishes, and it's often used for cooking and baking. Ginger contains compounds called "gingerols", which are capable of many health benefits. Whether they are benefits that are used on a daily basis or it's just a one-time remedy, there's still a good deal of information available about how ginger can be used to stimulate the immune system, improve sleep, treat conditions like arthritis, lower cholesterol, and to just smell good. It's often used as a substitute for common spices like garlic, but it can also be used in place of onions in recipes. Because of the unique combination of beneficial compounds and aromas, ginger is also known as the Queen of Spices. When ginger is cooked, it turns from a green to a red-orange color. This is because the pectin and phytochemicals (the compounds within the ginger that give it so many health benefits) are released. The Ginger Institute website has some more useful tips for cooking. Ingredient #3. Ginger, sort of like Manic Panic For many people, ginger makes them feel quite good, but it can also be quite medicinal. If you enjoy ginger, here are some ways to incorporate it into a healthy lifestyle: Ginger Tea - Binge on your teas throughout the day. Ginger is great when it comes to treating stomach issues, so if you're suffering from nausea or indigestion, ginger may be the answer. Steep tea bags for 10 to 15 minutes, then drink it throughout the day. - Binge on your teas throughout the day.
