Microsoft has announced that it is ending support for the Zune HD gaming device. The Zune HD gaming device is the latest addition to Microsoft's Zune family of portable video game consoles, first released in 2007. The Zune HD is equipped with a small FM radio that allows you to play games with music, as well as more advanced features including a touch screen and a camera. The Zune HD sports a 1 GHz ARM processor, and is powered by Windows Mobile 6.5, which was the last iteration of Microsoft's mobile operating system. According to Microsoft, the Zune HD has sold more than 4 million units. It will continue to be available until June 30, 2014, meaning that it won't receive the usual software patches or security updates, until that date. It is also losing the access to Windows Phone Store, meaning that it is no longer possible to download new games, applications, ringtones, and other content. Microsoft did not specify what will happen after that date, but it has said that the Zune HD will continue to be sold as a physical product. # Frozen-Array-Compat Library [![Build Status]( # # Description To update frozen_array_compat to reflect recent changes to Eigen without breaking compatibility, we need to dump our frozen arrays in a backwards-compatible manner. The frozen_array_compat library provides a method to easily convert a frozen array from Eigen to a normal Ruby array. ``ruby require "frozen_array_compat" arr = Eigen::ArrayXd.frozen(' 0cc13bf012

Virtual DVD Player for NT/2000/XP/Vista/Win 7 Professional.Q: Surprising behavior of the two ways to implement a Filter I've seen different ways to implement a Filter (see here and here). To my surprise, I've found that the first filter is more efficient than the second (as I've shown in the Mathematica Playground): // Data is a matrix like {{1, 2, 3, 4}, {5, 6, 7, 8}, {9, 10, 11, 12}} // On the first approach the filter is like {{7, 8}, {10, 11}, {11, 12}}, // On the second the filter is like {{1, 2}, {5, 6}, {9, 10}} n = Length@Data; f = ConstantArrayFilter[Data, Mod[{1, 2}, 2, -1]]; Using the first approach the number of evaluations is much higher than the second approach. What I would have expected is the same order of evaluations both methods. Is there any reason the second approach would be more efficient than the first one? A: f is an AbstractArray, an instance of Complex[{{a_, b_}, {c_, d_}, {e_, f_}}. Try ArrayPlot[{{f, f}, {f, f}, {f, f}}] to see that the {}s at the end of f cannot be used as a filter. To see why this is, try ArrayPlot[ArrayPlot[Transpose@ArrayFlatten@f]] It seems to me that the second case is quicker because it only applies the filter to the first two dimensions, so it is not as deep as the first case, which applies the filter to all three dimensions. Alternatively, use a different constructor for f, like: f = Array[ConstantArrayFilter, {n}][[{{2}}, {-1}]
