Koenigsberg 1945 is a long game of war. A player can choose from the Soviet, Axis or Allied side. The game is suitable for 2 to 4 players. Your options will primarily be military: armies move on a map and take control of cities and other territories, or air forces will support your armies. In each game you will command your army on the field for 24 hours. Your army can be specialized in a specific technology, such as tanks, planes or artillery. The game is won by the player with the most points on the map at the end of the game. Expect naval warfare. Players must design a transportation system based on the map and on the resources of your cities.

Replayability: event cards activate new rules that are part of the game as if they came from the event card. All changes are automatically applied to the players' deck of cards and you can choose to stay with your original strategy or to retry at will. In addition, the players can earn alternative victory points by manipulating the map or developing military superiority.

If you did not know already, an 'Aww!' post like the one above is a super popular type of posting. It is called an 'aww' post, because it's an 'Aww!' like the word 'aww'. It implies excitement, happiness, agreement or sympathy. If you did not know already, an 'Aww!' post like the one above is a super popular type of posting. It is called an 'aww' post, because it's an 'Aww!' like the word 'aww'. It implies excitement, happiness, agreement or sympathy. I have never seen this game before. I thought it would be a series for late winter / late summer. It would be very interesting and quite a change from the classic. I will have to definitely try it out some time. Thank you for this review. It's definitely worth to try it. Have you experienced Wars Across the World (WATW) yet? If not, here it is again: Well,

[Updated-2022]

The game is dedicated to the 195th anniversary of the liberation of the city of Koenigsberg by the Soviet Army. The city of Koenigsberg was liberated on January 13th 1945 with the help of the 2nd and 3rd Bielorussian Fronts. The first and last attempt of the Germans to stop the Soviets was halted by General Kurt von Tippelskirch, the Chief of Staff of the German 19th Army. This first effort was made a few days later by General der Infanterie Hans Kreysing, the commander of the German 1st Army. Both efforts were unsuccessful. Signed-off on the 13th of January 1945. A German viewpoint. The Soviet player. A Soviet viewpoint. Estimated Playtime: 6h Favored Side: Soviets Hardest to Play: Soviets About The Game: Each turn, one player must move all his units towards the nearest nearest city and gain control of it. Koenigsberg 1945 is modeled after the real events of the Second World War. This game is not a war game at all. A lot of the new system makes this more obvious but to make this point clear, the game is not a simulation of the war, it is a game of strategy and tactics. The player is given the task of steering the Germans towards the Baltic coast, while the Soviets move through East Prussia as they see fit. One player controls the German and the other the Soviet army. The gameplay is based around the progress of both sides towards the city of Koenigsberg, which is the objective in the game. The game starts with a randomized map of East Prussia and Koenigsberg. East Prussia Koenigsberg Koenigsberg has been liberated on January 13th, but the allies need to take it to win the game. Koenigsberg 1945. The objective is to take the city to ensure that it is liberated. The player who represents the Soviet 2nd and 3rd Bielorussian Front and the Army Group Center of the German Wehrmacht wins the game. Each side has an army and navy corps (see image 3). Tasks: The military campaign is divided into five phases. Each phase lasts for three days, except for the last one which is 2 days: Phase 1: January 13th to January 15th The 1st Bielorussian Front and the 3rd Belorussian Front begin moving into the city of Koenigsberg and the south-west suburbs. Phase 2: January 16th to January 18th The 2nd Bielorussian Front and the 4th Belorussian Front open a front to the north-west of the city and push through the suburbs. Phase 3: January 19th to January 21st A counter attack by several German divisions takes place to the north of the city. Phase 4: January 22nd to January 24th The Soviet 3rd Belorussian Front launches an offensive against the German defenses to the south and the east of the city. Phase 5: January 25th to February 2nd The Soviet 2nd Belorussian Front launches an offensive against the eastern suburbs. At the end of the game, the player who has taken the most yellow-colored icons will be named winner. All the cities and towns in the game are labeled and colored. Click them to use their functions. The game's event cards and the following event cards are highlighted, as are the hexes containing a victory point for that card. Handling phases and tiles: Move phase: There are two ways to move (1) move a soldier or (2) move a weapon. A soldier can move up to two hexes for free. For each movement from one hex to the next that exceeds that limit, one must be paid on one's turn. Weapons must move directly. Repair, ammunition and supply phase: The maintenance of a tank or plane costs one maintenance card. The main difference in the maintenance between tanks and planes is that planes are classed as Class AA and tanks are classed as Class A. Class AA planes and tanks must take one maintenance card and the rest of their vehicles must take one maintenance card. The maintenance of a tank is free. The maintenance of a plane is free

Armageddon here in the east is only one of the battles, some are more important than others. Now, I am going to leave the "battle for Berlin" to the Germans, I shall focus on the west, it is much more important and, in many ways, crucial because the Soviets have a very real, large flank in their push to reunite their new country. They are attacking from the Baltic, attacking through Poland, the Carpathians and western Bulgaria. The Western Allies held an upper hand this time around. Between the Germans having no idea where Allies were and how many, and the Allies having horrendous weather aiding in their surprise, the Allies actually got in the war more quickly and more easily than the Germans. Furthermore, the concentration of troops in the American and British zones was never anything like as high as was required for an all-out offensive. By the middle of 1942, the same was true for the Russians. Unlike in 1941, this time the Allies were able to link up the beach areas with the Condor through a common defense line (for every two lands, one vehicle). This allowed two attacks to be made simultaneously. With proper call-ups, the Russian front was very able to support the invasion of Normandy (both the offensive in Normandy and movement up the littoral). It was not going to support the north African invasion either. The Soviet Union was not yet ready for action in North Africa, as they suffered losses on the south. The plan worked well. Operation Jupiter, soon joined by Rugged, was one attempt to go west, the second to go east. Both made their run by landing at Gold and Sword Beaches, the D-Day a landings to the fore had other advantages in the winter months of the European year. The Germans did not have the same number of panzers (as they did in the east) and were now very spread out, furthermore they did not have some of the new tanks like the Tiger and Panther during the invasion. With the Germans in retreat, the Allied advance was rapid. By the end of the year, only Baden and Austria seemed to have withstood them. The south is where the greatest devastation occurred, and to some degree that has been reconstructed with ever growing memorials. To the north, however, the Russian front was able to hold. Even as late as April 1945, the last German counter offensive was only able to hold firm on the western outskirts of Koenigsberg. The city itself
