Wadsworth helps law firm raise awareness for autism When it was announced in June that Wendy Wadsworth was accepted into Yale University's School of Management, her first thought was: that's a relief. "I was relieved to know I'd get to go to school — hopefully," she said. "I didn't know if I'd make the school, though, so it was definitely a relief." At the time of her acceptance, Wadsworth was taking courses at the University of Denver, which is convenient because it's also the law school of her alma mater, the University of Denver School of Law. When Wadsworth met with her school counselor and adviser, she was told she would be able to fulfill her legal studies through the University of Denver's School of Law. However, she also said, the counselor informed her that if she would also be eligible for Yale's School of Management, she would be accepted into both schools. "I was told I would have a choice between the schools," she said. Wadsworth knew immediately she wanted to attend the school, she said, because of its strong connections to some of her interests, such as law, medicine and medicine. She added that she felt it would be fun to study there and would enjoy the benefit of having a diverse environment. "I liked the idea of having so many different fields and types of people to interact with," she said. In the wake of her acceptance to Yale, people from Yale contacted her and requested to hear about her experience and how she was accepted to Yale. This led to Wadsworth's participation in the school's first student autism panel in September. During this panel, she talked with students about the experiences she has had
