The production of powders such as superalloys, and their subsequent consolidation to form high pressure, high temperature solid state sintered products of the type conventionally required in the manufacture of turbine components, has traditionally involved processes such as atomization, which results in extremely fine powder having a high surface area and which,

therefore, normally requires a subsequent plastic consolidation, known as “sprue feeding”. In general, it is the plastic consolidation step, which allows for the filling of the complex component shapes, thereby eliminating the need for subsequent machining operations, which typically is required for making complex components from atomized powders. While the plastic consolidation step results in products that are satisfactory for many purposes, it nevertheless also results in a series of highly significant disadvantages that
