In a principal aspect the present invention relates to a vacuum cleaner having an improved brush assembly which provides an effective yet easy to use means of separating dirt and dust from an accessory such as an air filter. Vacuum cleaners generally include a dust and dirt separator assembly known as a brush assembly. The brush assembly includes a number of bristles projecting from a brush support plate and a rotatable brush bar is mounted to the brush support plate adjacent the bristle tips. The bristles are usually spring loaded so as to automatically extend out into the suction air stream to sweep dirt and dust into the tub of the vacuum cleaner. A dust bag is mounted to the cleaner to catch the dirt and dust collected by the bristles. In operation it is generally desirable to periodically remove the dust bag from the brush assembly and empty it. For this purpose a discharge tube is mounted to the cleaner and extends from a discharge outlet opening on the underside of the cleaner. The discharge tube typically extends outwardly from the back or bottom of the cleaner so that it may be simply emptied by hand. The brush assembly generally provides a dependable means of gathering dirt and dust, particularly in carpet cleaning applications. However, it is generally desirable to have a dust bag which is easily removable from the brush assembly. This not only saves cleaning time but also greatly reduces the possibility of the user being bitten by the brush assembly and inhaling small quantities of dust contained in the air. One solution to this problem has been to provide a discharge tube which is extended outwardly of the back of the cleaner and which is thus readily accessible to the user when emptying the dust bag. This solution results in the dust bag being supported in an inverted position on the discharge tube. This arrangement may be considered desirable for so long as the discharge tube remains clear to be manually emptied. However, over time the discharge tube tends to become somewhat blocked and the dust bag is no longer readily removable from the assembly. It should be recognized that the dust bag and discharge tube must be disposed of when the bag or tube become blocked so as to avoid potential exposure to pollutants. In order to avoid the above situation, it has been known to provide a chute adapted to transfer dust and debris from the discharge tube to the dust bag. However, in some applications, such as discoballs for example, these arrangements have been found
