The effect of the right anterior hippocampus and the periventricular white matter lesions on the learning ability of Parkinson's disease patients. The aim of this study was to determine the effect of the right anterior hippocampus and the periventricular white matter lesions on the learning ability of Parkinson's disease (PD) patients. Twenty-seven PD patients were included in this study. Bilateral magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) was performed. The patients were divided into three groups: PD with periventricular white matter lesions (PVWML); PD without PVWML; and healthy controls. The volumes of the right anterior hippocampus and the periventricular white matter lesions were measured, and the learning ability was evaluated by a series of learning tests. The right anterior hippocampus volumes (63.2 +/- 14.7 ml in the PD with PVWML group; 78.1 +/- 17.7 ml in the PD without PVWML group; and 82.4 +/- 13.7 ml in the control group) and the volumes of the periventricular white matter lesions (3.2 +/- 1.7 cm³ in the PD with PVWML group; 5.8 +/- 2.2 cm³ in the PD without PVWML group; and 4.8 +/- 2.4 cm³ in the control group) were significantly smaller in the PD with PVWML group than in the PD without PVWML and the control groups (pEditor's Note: (Jose Antonio Vargas, the author of Looking for Obama, is an immigrant.
