techlaw blog (itlb) amy hill, who serves as the director of the speech technology and inclusion project at the american civil liberties union (aclu) of northern california, and who has testified before congress on speech-generating technologies several times before the federal communications commission. in a notable but not unexpected move, the house of representatives yesterday passed the second version of a bill to amend the communications act of 1934, in order to require the federal communications commission to adopt rules to regulate the use of automated voice technology (often marketed as “digital assistants” or “virtual assistants”) before mid-2020. the language of the legislative text that emerged from a markup session yesterday is as follows: if you would like to read the entire bill text, you can view it here . on the surface, this would appear to be a relatively simple regulation. however, in the last week, three bills in the house and senate have proposed that the fcc expedite regulations on “automated and artificial intelligence technologies,” including that of “ais that impersonate a human.” the new technology can transform the way we experience the world by using the information that’s already available to us. in addition to ordinary viewing, ar technologies can overlay information on top of the real world, like the heat map for nearby restaurants that we can look at on google maps. 17 they can also take our understanding of the world and transform it by using artificial intelligence, giving us new insight into the images of the world we already know so well and increasing their depth and meaning.
